CUDA CONCEPT CAR

I thought this site is kind of cool. It is www.360Cuda.com. The company has designed a few Cuda concept cars for today's market. The designs are eye catching and thought out. The power plants will be a 385 hp 360 or a Hemi.

Options will include 17" Rallyes or mags, vinyl top and shaker hood.

Please take a moment to fill out the survey on the site. I for one would like to see this car go to production

The Plymouth Duster / Twister and Dodge Dart Sport

(Because of our club's recent raffle car acquisition I thought a little A body history would be appropriate).

When the Valiant line was new, it spawned a sporty version called the Barracuda. After a few short years, the Barracuda was spun off onto its own body type (E), a short of chopped-off version of the large B-bodies. Some criticized it for its weight, others for its assembly quality; yet, few could argue with its aesthetics.

This left the Valiant line without sporty body style for a few years - until the Duster was dreamed up. The Duster was incredibly popular, quickly eclipsing the A-body (and, for that matter, the E-body) Barracuda's sales. Part of the appeal was the price: the Duster offered looks and power within the Valiant budget. Part was the lightweight and powerful engine in the 340 (and, to a lesser degree, the 318) option: the 340 Duster put many big-blocks to shame at the stoplight and the track. Save for the front, the Duster was a car of curves, with few angles; its look has withstood the test of time, even if the actual cars generally have not (it's hard to justify putting hundreds of dollars in regular maintenance such as new shocks, brakes, and tires when the car itself sells for $200).

The Duster was created in 1969 for the 1970 model year; the name would, not surprisingly, outlast the Valiant itself. It came with the slant six (125 or 145 gross hp with the 198 or 225 cid versions), 318 "economy V-8" (230 gross hp), or a high-performance 340 (275 gross hp), a stunning engine for the times. The overall height was 52.6 inches, headroom (front) 37.2 inches, wheelbase 108 inches. The large trunk had nearly 16 cubic feet of space, hidden neatly by the styling. The interior was borrowed directly from the Valiant, as one might expect. The base price of $2172 bought a very basic model with a three-speed column-shifted manual transmission and no power assistance, which made the brakes and steering into exercise equipment; few decided not to spring for power brakes and steering. This was only a little above the base price of the original (1960) Valiant.

The 340 Duster took advantage of the platform's light weight to make mincemeat of many cars with bigger engines (Mustang 351), particularly with the aid of its dual exhaust, four-barrel carburetor, floor-mounted manual (three speed!), and 3.23:1 rear axle ratio. Following Chrysler's practice of matching transmissions to cars, it had a heavy-duty suspension with larger diameter torsion bars, extra leaf springs, and a front stabilizer bar; it also had standard front discs, quite unusual at the time. The instrument panel was unique to the 340 Duster, and included a tachometer and 150 mph speedometer. All this for only $400 over the base price - $2547 in all! That was quite a bit less than the RoadRunner ($2900) or Mustang Mach I ($3300).

In 1973, new grilles were added to the Duster and its Dodge version, bringing their appearance in line with other A-bodies. The Space Duster was added, with over 50 cubic feet of cargo space. The next year, 1974, was the most popular for the Duster. Unfortunately, 1974 coincided with the loss of the 340, and its replacement with the heavier 360 - despite its 245 hp or higher torque than the 340.

Not quite word for word from www.valiant.org great website.
